This is what I found with one of the companies I worked with while designing a custom customer survey tool. They were constantly running into issues and were always losing customers in the form of leads and support tickets. In addition to this, they were continually hearing from angry customers who would complain about how they felt they had been misled. These issues were made worse by their inability to proactively reach out to the key stakeholders within their business. After speaking with their director and managing partner the issues were clear, but how could they fix this? What had happened was they were relying on customers to give them feedback that they deemed important, as a matter of fact they were blindly relying on the customers to provide this feedback. However, they wanted to provide it in a better way, not as a matter of fact but as a matter of course. The first issue they had to face was how to put a process in place that would make this possible. After speaking with their director and managing partner the problems were clear, but how would they fix this? What they came up with was taking their time to actually listen to their customers and then categorizing the feedback that they received. What they would do is take the best and brightest of the feedback and send out a really nice email to their customers saying thank you and what f678e9f9e
